

When, Why, and for Whom Was the Didache Created?

An Attempt to Gain Insights into the Social and Historical Setting of the Didache Communities

Prof. Aaron Milavec
Tilburg, 07 April 2003

In the course of the last sixteen years, my ideas regarding the Didache have changed many times. During this period, three convictions have emerged that have guided my studies:

1. Unity of the Didache -- Up to this point, a unified reading of the Didache has been impossible because the prevailing assumption has been that the Didache was created in stages with the compiler splicing together pre-existing documents with only a minimum of editing. The end result, therefore, was a complex (or even a haphazard) collage that joined together bits and pieces of traditional material coming from unidentified communities and unknown authors. Thanks to the impact of Jacob Neusner during our 1988 summer seminar on "Religious Systems," I have slowly come to the conviction that the Didache has a marvelous unity from beginning to end which, up to this point, has gone unnoticed.
2. Independence of the Didache from the Gospels -- The Didache has been widely understood as citing either Matthew's Gospel or some combination of the Matthean or Lucan traditions. From this vantage point, it followed that the date of composition had to be set beyond the 80s and that the Synoptic material could be used to help interpret and understand the Didache. Thanks to my work with Willy Rordorf during the summers of 1990 and 1992, I came to an early appreciation of the possibility that the Didache might have been created without any dependence upon any known gospel. My extensive study of this issue demonstrates that the internal logic, theological orientation, and pastoral practice of the Didache runs decisively counter to what one finds within the received gospels.<sup>1</sup> The repercussions of this conclusion are enormous: (a) I am encouraged to return to a mid-first century dating for the Didache, and (b) I am prohibited from using Matthew's Gospel by way of clarifying the intent of the Didache.
3. The Didache's Oral Character -- Given the manifest clues of orality<sup>2</sup> within the Didache itself, one can be quite certain that it was originally composed orally and that it circulated on the lips of the members of this community for many years before any occasion arose that called for a scribe to prepare a textual version. The Didache was created in "a culture of high residual orality"<sup>3</sup> wherein "oral sources" attached to respected persons were routinely given greater weight and were immeasurably more serviceable than "written sources".<sup>4</sup> Furthermore, recent studies have demonstrated that oral repetition has a measure of socially maintained stability but not the frozen rigidity of a written text.<sup>5</sup> As such, any methodology circumscribed by the bias of textuality and ignorant of orality can no longer be relied upon to explain the origin, the internal structures, and the use of the Didache.

Recovering the Orality of the Didache

To test this "orality" on the part of the Didache, I decided some dozen years ago to memorize it. Linda Bartholomew and other members of the National Organization of Biblical Storytellers gave me some practical hints on how to do this. For my part, I was skeptical. Let's face it, I had become thoroughly habituated to making, consulting, and relying upon written records--in everything from analyzing texts to shopping for groceries. Once I began, however, I surprised myself. By abandoning the norms of linear logic that structure written texts, I gradually found that I was able to intuit the oral logic that structured the Didache. Once this happened, I memorized the Didache with great ease.

Once the whole of the Didache was in my bones, I took every opportunity to perform it. Before my students. Before my faculty. At regional meetings of learned societies. As word got around, I was even invited to perform it before a Jewish audience. With each performance, I was adjusting my translation and expanding my understanding of the narrative until, in gradual steps, I finally felt assured that my narrative performance revealed the flow of topics and the marvelous unity hidden below the surface from beginning to end. The suspicion that overcame me, therefore, is that I had recovered the same thread that those who originally recited the Didache relied upon for ordering their recitation.

In my seminars, consequently, I perform segments of the Didache so that participants can take in the oral feel before they read it on the page. I furthermore invite participants to make a tape of the Didache that they can listen to as they go to sleep at night or as they travel back and forth in their cars.<sup>6</sup> I wonder if anyone here has done this for him/herself. . . .

The Organizational Unity of the Didache in a Nutshell

The object of my thousand-page commentary<sup>7</sup> is to reconstruct the pastoral genius of the framers of the Didache. In a nutshell, this pastoral genius consisted in establishing a comprehensive, step-by-step program of formation that would transform the settled habits of perceiving and of judging of gentile candidates seeking perfection in their new religious movement. Throughout, the framers of the Didache gave detailed norms and practical descriptions of what was to be done. Behind these particulars, however, lie the concerns and the anxieties, the experience and the successes of senior mentors who, over a period of time, worked with candidates and fashioned a training program which transmitted, in measured and gradual steps, the operative values and theological underpinnings which knit together their individual and collective lives. Undoubtedly the framers of the Didache were well aware that any community that did not effectively pass on its values, its rites, its way of life would flounder and eventually perish from the face of the earth. The Didache was the insurance policy that this was not going to happen to them!

Within the next twenty minutes, I will reconstruct some of the hidden dynamics of this training program in order to allow you to glimpse something of its organic unity. I will also reflect upon the key importance of selecting and testing an origination hypothesis by way of resolving the perplexing question of when, why, and how the Didache was created and used.

The Way of Life As Implying an Apprenticeship

After defining the Way of Life using the dual definitions, the Didache turns its attention to "the training [required for the assimilation] of these words" (1:3). The Greek word didachê makes reference to the training that a master-trainer (didaskalos) imparts to apprentices or disciples. In classical Greek, basket weaving, hunting with a bow, and pottery making represent typical skills transmitted under the term didachê (TDNT 3.135). For our purposes here, it is significant to note that the verb didaskein--customarily translated as "to teach"--was normally used to refer to a prolonged apprenticeship under the direction of a master:

Thus, didaskein is the word used more especially for the imparting of practical or theoretical knowledge when there is a continued activity with a view to a gradual, systematic, and therefore all the more fundamental assimilation (TDNT 3.135).

When one examines the particulars of the training outline, it is apparent that one does not arrive at the skills necessary to "love those who hate you" (1:3c) or to "judge with justice" (4:3) merely by being told to do so on one or two occasions.<sup>8</sup> Accordingly, while all the English translations prepared to date have been content to translate didachê as "teaching," it is evident that the force of didachê is better rendered as "training." Moreover, in our contemporary society, "teaching" is associated with classroom instruction, and, in the popular mind, this often evokes the passing on of information from professor to student. The word "training," on the contrary, has the advantage of suggesting the dynamics of an apprenticeship wherein novices gradually and progressively assimilate the performance skills of a master-trainer (didaskalos). In what follows, consequently, the terms "master-trainer," "mentor," and "spiritual parent" will accordingly be used in preference to "teacher" to identify the one who trains.

This usage finds confirmation from modern studies of how the rudiments of a scientific, artistic, or religious tradition are passed on from one generation to the next. Michael Polanyi, more especially, has noted that all deep knowing implies a way of being in one's body and a way of being in the world that cannot be transmitted by a mere telling in words.<sup>9</sup> For an adult to learn the ways of a master, a novice has to submit to a prolonged apprenticeship. Polanyi notes that, even during an apprenticeship, learning depends upon a certain sympathy that exists between the novice and the master. This sympathy begins in the spontaneous admiration that prompts the novice to establish a master-apprentice relationship in the first place. This sympathy operates throughout the apprenticeship itself, giving the novice the means to enter into and to assimilate the performance skills exhibited by his/her trusted master.<sup>10</sup> The authority of a master, consequently, is directed toward progressively enlarging the performance skills of novices such that they, in the end, demonstrate that they understand his/her words because they share the way of being and doing that is upheld and prized by the community to which they belong.

Remembering One's Mentor, the Presence of the Lord, and "Trembling"

Mentors understood themselves as "speaking to you the word of God" (4:1); hence, they were honored "as the Lord" (4:1). It becomes apparent in the eucharistic prayers that even Jesus was identified as 'the servant of the Father who revealed the Way of Life' and, as a consequence, was honored as the Lord "for where the dominion of the Lord is spoken of, there the Lord is" (4:1). Faced with this realization, the Didache notes, in passing, that the novice became someone "trembling through all time at the words that you have heard" (3:8).

The internal clues of the Didache thus demonstrate that the Way of Life was not received as mere information. Having been set upon the path of life by "the God who made you" (1:2), the novice literally trembled with excited anticipation and reverential fear. This was the way that Israel originally experienced the word of the Lord from Mt. Sinai (Ex 19:16) and the way that the prophets came to discover the transforming power of their own callings (e.g., Ezra 9:4, Is 66:2, Hab 3:16).

The temptation might exist to trivialize "trembling" and to imagine that here one finds only a pious metaphor. On the other hand, those of you who have studied the phenomenology of scientific knowing by Michael Polanyi<sup>11</sup> or those of you who have first-hand experience of being transformed by an apprenticeship under the direction of a beloved mentor might well imagine that this is the stuff of which the Didache speaks.

Consider, for example, the case of Malcolm X. In his autobiography, Malcolm recalls how he trembled at reading Elijah Mohammed's words during his time in prison.<sup>12</sup> This was so, not because someone had told him to do so, but because the words of his spiritual master were liberating him from his former way of death and opening him up to embrace his true destiny and calling as a Black Muslim.

I went to bed every night ever more awed. If not Allah, who else could have put such wisdom into that little humble lamb of a man from the Georgia fourth grade and sawmills and cotton patches. . . . My adoration of Mr. Muhammad grew. . . . My worship of him was so awesome that he was the first man whom I had ever feared--not fear such as of a man with a gun, but the fear such as one has of the power of the sun (210, 211, 212).<sup>13</sup>

This is what the Didache means when it speaks of "remember[ing] night and day the one speaking to you the word of God" (4:1) and "trembling at all times at the words that you have received" (3:8). This same phenomenology existed among the classical rabbis where it was commonplace to find disciples listening to their masters "with awe and fear, with trembling and trepidation" (b. Berakhot 22a).

Whether Each Novice Had a Single Spiritual Mentor

The Didache offers evidence suggesting that each novice was paired off with a single spiritual master. The principal clue for this is the fact that the entire training program (save for Did. 1:3) addresses a single novice using the second-person singular. If, under normal circumstances, a single spiritual master were assigned the training of many or all the novices within a community, one would have expected that the second-person plural would have been used throughout. Furthermore, within the Way of Life training program, the novice is instructed to actively remember and mull over the life and the training of "the one speaking to you the word of God" (4:1). This use of the singular here points in the direction of each novice having a single master. So, too, when regulations are put forward for choosing the water for baptism (7:2f) and for ordering "the one being baptized to fast beforehand" (7:4), in each case the singular is used--again confirming the expectation that each candidate was baptized individually by a single individual--presumably the one who was their spiritual mentor and parent.

Since women in the ancient world were accustomed to be trained by other women (#1g, #2b)<sup>14</sup>, and since it would have been a source of scandal for a man to be alone for prolonged periods with a woman unrelated to him, it would be presumed that, save for special circumstances, women were appointed to train female candidates, and men were appointed to train male candidates.

Whether the Didache Envisioned Training Women

Matthew 5-8 provides an illustration of a training program directed to men. Phrases like "angry with his brother" (5:22) and "your brother has something against you" (5:24) and "eye of your brother" (7:4) reflect the mediterranean world in which men inhabited the public spaces and settled their concerns. The women in the courtyards, meanwhile, are silently passed over. Jesus' observations about the one "looking at a woman lustfully" or "divorcing his wife" (5:28, 31) again captures exclusively the male point of view.

In contrast, while the Didache focuses upon issues that apply particularly to women,<sup>15</sup> other aspects apply particularly to men.<sup>16</sup> The household codes of Did. 4:9-11 are noticeably inclusive. In fact, my gender-inclusive translation<sup>17</sup> makes it evident that women and women's issues were being addressed throughout the Didache. Furthermore, the Greek expression teknon mou (3:1-6) literally signifies "my offspring" without regard for age or sex. In this context, it cannot be supposed that the master-trainer is the biological father or mother of the novice. Within the Septuagint, teknon mou is already used metaphorically as an intimate form of address (Gn 43:29) or to denote a novice in relationship to his trainer and mentor (1 Sm 3:16, 26:17). This gender-inclusive term aptly captures the fact that the Didache addresses women and their concerns. In contrast, Jewish wisdom literature normally addresses the gendered "my son" and then proceeds to warn against being intoxicated by loose women (e.g., Prv 5:20). The wisdom of the Didache, therefore, stands apart from most first century instructional material by deliberately offering training to women (#1e, #1f, #1k, #2n). Such training insures that women within the Didache communities were expected to be active participants within community affairs.<sup>18</sup> As Deborah Rose-Gaier rightly notes, nowhere in the Didache does one find "a household code whereby wives are subordinate to their husbands."<sup>19</sup>

Just as the Didache omits subordinating wives to their husbands, it likewise omits the Lord's commandment requiring children to honor their parents. Gentiles could hardly be trained to honor their parents (Ex 20:12) when that "filial piety" so highly prized by Romans would have made the desertion of ancestral gods and the abandonment of their parental upbringing unthinkable save in those instances wherein an entire patriarchal household converted to the Lord as a group (e.g., as in the case of the household of Cornelius in Acts 10). Given the implication of Did. 1:3f (namely, that many or most novices were encountering hostile resistance to their conversion from parents and siblings)<sup>20</sup>, it became impossible to honor their parents and, at the same time, to honor the God of Israel. Accordingly, novices preparing to enter the community were directed to honor God as their true Father (1:5, 9:2f, 10:2) and to accept their mentors as their true parent (4:8). Not even God can require two contradictory commitments.

First Rule--Praying for Enemies and Turning the Other Cheek

Seen from the vantage point of an orderly progressive of topics, the initial section dealing with praying for enemies and turning the other cheek would appear to be placed at the head of the training program because new recruits had to be immediately prepared to receive abusive treatment (1:3f). When examined in detail<sup>21</sup>, the "enemies" envisioned by the Didache were not highway robbers or Roman soldiers, but relatives and friends who had become antagonists due to the candidate's new religious convictions. Thus, praying and fasting (#4c) for such "enemies" functioned to sustain a comprehensive non-violent surrender to the abusive family situations hinted at in Did. 1:4.

Among other things, the abusive family situation envisioned the forcible seizure of the novice's goods (1:4). The candidate was instructed to yield completely to such hostile acts and, at the same time, to surrender his goods to beggars (1:5), not due to any compulsion, but simply because his/her "Father" wished it. What emerges here is the contrast between a natural father seizing his daughter's or son's assets and the Father in heaven who generously gives to everyone in need and invites imitation. The possibility of understanding the text as addressing such existential needs at the beginning of the training process cannot be seriously maintained unless one presumes that the Didache reflects a training process fashioned to address the situation of real candidates.

The Great Difference Between the Two Rules of Giving

Within the training program, the issue of giving is taken up at the very beginning and, again, near the very end. The first giving (1:4) is presented in the present imperative and represents the kind of giving the candidate was expected to practice immediately upon entering upon his/her apprenticeship. The second section on giving (4:5-8), however, is much more than a reinforcement of the earlier giving. Now everything (save for 4:5) is presented in the future tense and the focus is on the routine "taking and giving" and the much more extensive "partnering" of all one's resources "with your brother [or sister]" (4:8) (#2m, #2o). The future tense used here could function as a mild imperative (as in English) but then this would leave the awkward situation whereby two diverse rules of giving are provided and no attempt is made to harmonize them. On the other hand, if one examines the second set of rules for giving, one discovers that this later giving involves sharing one's resources with members of the community--a situation that would prevail only after the time the candidate had gained admittance as a full member of the movement through baptism.

Consider the character of the first kind of giving (1:5). The novice is taught to yield "to anyone asking you for anything" simply because "the Father wishes to give these things from his own free gifts" (1:5). This is the first instance where the fatherhood of God is introduced within the pragmatic theology of imitatio dei ("the imitation of God"). God gives freely; hence, in imitation of the one who has blessed the novice with the necessities of life, the novice acts in a parallel fashion.<sup>22</sup> Acting as a faithful steward or broker, the novice dispenses not his own resources but the Father's "free gifts." In so doing, the novice is prohibited from feeling proud or generous in the act of giving since whatever he or she gives belongs to the Father to begin with. The one receiving, meanwhile, need not feel humiliated or indebted to the one giving (namely, "do not ask for it back") since, in point of fact, the recipient is receiving what belongs to the Father.<sup>23</sup>

Roman society placed great emphasis upon the inviolability of private ownership and upon economizing; hence, Romans felt no moral or civic obligation to come to the aid of the poor or destitute.<sup>24</sup> There were public benefactors, to be sure, who erected monuments, subsidized festivals, and provided short-term relief in the face of emergencies. Such persons, however, did so with the motive of promoting themselves and their families as "benefactors." In contrast, the rule of giving advanced by the Didache is calculated to break down and replace these very instincts. To enforce this, the novice is further prevented from even examining the worthiness or honesty of the one asking (1:5). This final examination is left in God's hands. Thus, by this rule of action, the former stubborn instincts governing possessions is broken down and replaced by the notion of stewardship, gratitude, and imitatio dei. Those incapable of implementing the rule of Did. 1:5 would have to be sent away since, in the end, such persons would be incapable of practicing a lifelong responsiveness to the needs of "brothers" and "sisters" within the community they aspired to join. The opening rule of giving, consequently, now appears as the absolutely indispensable training grounds for the economic partnership that comes later. And this is only the first of eight pragmatic reasons accounting for this rule.<sup>25</sup>

The Progressive Training Implied in the Two Ways Schema

When one examines how material is set out in the Way of Life, one must allow that a progressive training program is implied. For example, notice how the negative prohibitions (2:2-7) come first. Then, once this foundation is in place, "fences" (3:1-6) can be introduced by way of supplying a framework whereby grave infractions are prevented by avoiding minor infractions. Finally, once minor infractions are checked, then positive virtues can be cultivated (3:7-10). Any mentor who would scramble this propaedeutic order would clearly be building on sand and risking disaster.

The Art of Reconciliation Revealed by Degrees

From 4:2 onward, everything is framed in the simple future tense. Herein one hears the novice being trained for future eventualities that will emerge only after baptism when community life become a possibility. The Didache first holds out the future promise of finding "rest" among the "saints" (4:2), and then it addresses the darker side of community life: "dissent" and "fighting" (4:3). The novice is trained to anticipate the obligation of intervening in these latter instances. The details of this intervention, however, are kept for later when the practice of "reproving" and "shunning" are spelled out in detail (15:3). From this case, one can learn that the ordering of materials does not stop with the end of the Way of Life but continues throughout the whole of the Didache. One might suspect, therefore, that whenever the same issue shows up in two places, this might have been done deliberately in order to respect the condition of the candidate and to implement the principle of gradualism.

As another instance of this, consider the confession of failings. Training in the Way of Life closes with the injunction that "in church [i.e., in the assembly], you will confess your failings" (4:14). The novice is thus alerted that all the particulars of the Way of Life would be used for an examination of conscience and a public admission of failures. For the moment, the candidate is entirely unfamiliar with the eucharistic meal; hence, neither the time, place, or the character of this confession are presented. This will come later at D14:1-3. It suffices that the novice be forewarned that a confession will take place so that "you will not go to your prayer with a bad conscience" (4:14). This general rubric suffices and, in due course, will give way to a theology of sacrifice once the eucharist is experienced. Again, the condition of the candidate is respected and the principle of gradualism prevails.

The Nature of the Perfection Required by the Didache

In 1987, David Flusser argued that those preparing for baptism were told to observe as much of the Torah as possible, including food regulations, "in order to strengthen the ties of gentile Christians believers with Jews believing in Christ who were `all zealous of the Law [Torah]' (Acts 21:20).<sup>26</sup> Four years later<sup>27</sup>, Jonathan Draper, who has always impressed me with his creative and insightful scholarship, championed a similar position seemingly independent of Flusser's study. Draper concludes that "the Didache allows the proselyte flexibility about the timetable, but at the end of the day, it is required of him/her that he/she become a full Jew in order to attain salvation."<sup>28</sup> Draper's thesis has been enthusiastically received in some circles.<sup>29</sup> Finally, with the collaboration of Huub van de Sandt and Flusser, a modified version of Flusser's 1987 thesis has been proposed in a book that will surely give it wide circulation.<sup>30</sup> While both Flusser and Draper are very persuasive and very keen to exploit every clue available to support their positions, I believe they are fundamentally mistaken and risk misinterpreting a foundational issue, namely, the centrality of the Way of Life as defining the perfection required of gentile proselytes in preparation for the coming of the Lord (Did. 16:2).<sup>31</sup>

My own reading of 6:2 begins by taking seriously 4:13 where the novice is warned just prior to the end of his/her training:

You will not at all leave behind the rules of the Lord, but you will guard the things you have received neither adding anything nor taking away.

The "rules of the Lord" here clearly look backward to the training received in the Way of Life. To be sure, the novice would be rightfully distressed if, in the very next session, he/she were told that everything received up to this point was only propaedeutic for learning/doing what Maimonides would later enumerate as the 613 prescriptions of Torah. "Hey, wait a minute!" the novice might object, "Didn't you just get finished telling me that nothing was to be added?" And, indeed, his distress would be right on target.

The gar-clause in 6:2 serves to explain what has gone before. Flusser gets off track because he mistakenly links 6:2 with the food prohibition of 6:3 that follow. When 6:2 looks backward to 6:1, it becomes clear that the novice is to hold fast to "this way of training" because, anyone able to entirely bear it "will be perfect" (6:2). Those unable to bear it, on the other hand, are urged to do what they can for, by and by, they will gradually become capable of bearing "the whole yoke of the Lord" (6:2).

Note that the framers of the Didache show themselves to be uncompromising on some points and lenient on others. When it comes to defining what constitutes "the rules of the Lord" (4:13) and "the way of training" (6:1), no room is allowed for confusion or half measures. When it comes to achieving these things, however, allowance is made for failure and for gradualism. Thus, the intent of Did. 6:1 is to define and to conserve the Lord's standards of excellence even if and when it is evident that not every novice will be able to perfectly meet these standards prior to baptism. Given the practice of the confession of failings, the novice will soon discover (a) that even professed members are striving for perfection and (b) that no one can continue to confess the same failing week after week without being stimulated by shame and urged on by fraternal love to correct that failing. This then is the pastoral genius of the Didache--being firm when it comes to defining the standards of the Lord while being lenient when it comes to embracing persons who fail and humbly return week after week acknowledging their failure.

In the end, contrary to Flusser and Draper, I therefore hold that the Way of Life is the only standard of perfection within the Didache. As Paula Fredrikson so capably puts it, the scandal of the gentile mission is that the Lord has made provisions for the salvation of the gentiles in the end times without requiring them to become Jews: "Gentiles are saved as gentiles: they do not, eschatologically, become Jews."<sup>62</sup> In fact, Fredrikson reminds us that this is, first and foremost, a Jewish perception of things and not a Christian invention that departs from Judaism. Paul formulated this doctrine in his way; the framers of the Didache did it in theirs. Neither knew of the other. Neither was the enemy of the other.

The Mysterious Placement of the Food Prohibitions

The absolute prohibition against eating "the food sacrificed to idols" (6:3) occurs at the beginning of what has frequently been accepted as the beginning of the "liturgical section." How or why this would be an introduction to a liturgical document never made sense to me. On the other hand, it is possible that the placement of this important and absolute injunction may have evolved in order to address a very practical purpose. As long as candidates were in training, they were obliged to refrain from attending the sacred community meals (9:5). This we know. Of necessity, therefore, most candidates would have been constrained to take part in family and community meals wherein, either regularly or periodically, offerings were made to the household gods as part of the meal or some portion of the meats served had been previously offered at a public altar.<sup>33</sup> Only with baptism a few days away, therefore, could the candidate be bound by this final rule.

The Key Significance of Pre-baptismal Fasting

Baptism marked a turning point. Social bonds were being broken, and new ones were being forged. Following baptism, every day would be spent visiting the saints and "rest[ing] upon their words" (4:2). Prior to baptism, however, most candidates probably felt the keen anticipation of entering into their new way of life along with the anxiety attendant upon the irreversible step that would cut them off from most of their family and friends. Anticipation and anxiety dulled their desire to eat (#3f). During these few days, it is no accident that the candidate was told to fast (7:4). And it is no accident that the one baptizing and able members of the community fasted in solidarity with the candidate (7:4). During this period, all "the food sacrificed to idols" eaten by the candidates was being expelled, and they were prepared for eating only the pure and sacred food at the homes of "brothers and sisters" since the communion meals binding them to ancestral gods would now be forever forbidden to them. The fasting, therefore, which was propaedeutic for the biweekly practice of fasting hardly needed an expressed theology.

The fasting prior to baptism led to feasting. While the Didache gives no strict chronology as to how much time expired between baptism and the first eucharist, one can easily read between the lines. If the candidate was meeting his/her "new family" for the first time at baptism, it is impossible to imagine that the newly baptized did not celebrate with his new family immediately thereafter. And given the eschatological significance of the eucharist, it is improbable that this meal would not have been the weekly eucharist. Without discussion of how I came to the following conclusions, I would like to put forward what I regard as the sequence of events:

1. Community gathers in the place of baptism (most have been fasting for two days)
2. Candidates led in by their spiritual mentors (all grow silent)

3. Mentors recite the Way of Life and Way of Death with the appropriate refrains
4. Each candidate is immersed, dried off, and re clothed in a dry tunic
5. New members are embraced and kissed (same sex only) by their new family
6. Lord's Prayer is prayed together for the first time (facing East)
7. All retire to the home where the fast-breaking feast (the eucharist) is prepared

Testing Various Origination Hypotheses--the Placement of Did. 14

When contending origination hypotheses examine the peculiarities of the Didache, they necessarily act like lenses that force their users to see things quite differently. Consider, for example, an easily recognized peculiarity of the text: Did. 9-10 presents what the text calls "the eucharist" (Did. 9:1) and, four chapters later, the confession of failings is described as taking place prior to the eucharist (Did. 14:1). One may wonder why the compiler did not place Did. 14 just prior to Did. 9-10 and thereby retain a topical and chronological unity to his finished text. Jean-Paul Audet takes this problem up as follows:

The author returns to the subject [in Did. 14] not because he is a bad writer, or because he had, oddly enough, forgotten something, or because he is compiling his materials at random, or because someone else had created a subsequent interpolation of 14:1-3, but simply because experience has demonstrated, in the meantime, the inadequacy of the instructions in 9-10.<sup>34</sup>

Audet's unwarranted assumption here is that the Didache was composed in writing. The author comes back with a fresh idea, the confession of failings, but there are no blank space prior to the eucharistic section to place it. Hence, he was forced to put it where he left off writing the last time (i.e., after 13:7).

Kurt Niederwimmer, for his part, imagined that the compiler of the Didache was "a respected and influential bishop" who "quotes existing, sometimes archaic rules and seeks both to preserve what has been inherited and at the same time to accommodate that heritage to his own time [turn of the second century]."<sup>165</sup> Niederwimmer was uneasy with the hypothesis of Rordorf<sup>166</sup> to the effect that Did. 14 was added later by a second compiler. He was also put off by Audet's thesis that the original writer returned to his document at a later time in order to supplement what he had written earlier. Rather, Niederwimmer tried to discern the internal logic ordering the text. Here is what he found: "in chaps. 11-13, the Didachist had, in a sense, looked outward (toward the arriving guests of the community), in chaps. 14-15 he looks inward (at the relationships within the community itself)."<sup>167</sup> Thus, according to Niederwimmer, the eucharistic prayers (Did. 9-10) came early because they were grouped with the prayer section (Did. 8:1-10:7); the confession of failings comes later because it is grouped in the "internal relationships" section (Did. 14-15). Beyond this grouping of materials, Niederwimmer did not look for or expect to find any reason why one grouping should come before or after another. In a word, given the lenses used by Niederwimmer, he did not see nor hear any sequential plan in the Didache.

Georg Schöllgen supplies us with an origination hypothesis much different from that of Niederwimmer. For him, the author "simply provides an authoritative regulation on controversial points."<sup>68</sup> Thus, Did. 9-10 responds to the problem of having "an aberrant or insufficient" or "no fixed formula"<sup>69</sup> for the eucharist. Did. 14, on the other hand, is directed toward resolving the author's concern for "the purity" of those eating the eucharistic meal.<sup>40</sup> Two topics; two places. Seemingly the author takes up controversial points in the idiosyncratic order that they occur to him. The origination hypothesis of Schöllgen does not lead him to anticipate finding any progression or ordering of topics beyond this. Schöllgen is neither surprised nor disappointed that no order exists. His theories teaches him how to look and what to look for. Schöllgen, not surprisingly, embraces an origination hypothesis that is entirely blind to any ordering or chronology of the topics.

My own origination hypothesis, on the contrary, leads me to anticipate a closely worked out progression of topics that follows the ordering of training and the experiences given to new members. Thus my hypothesis leads me to look for something which, for the moment, is hidden within the clues of the narrative:

Under ordinary circumstances, the Didache informs us that a confession of failings would have taken place by way of preparing the members of offer "a pure sacrifice" (Did. 14:1). The candidate preparing for baptism is informed of this confession near the end of his/her training (Did. 3:14). When one encounters the eucharistic prayers (Did. 9f), however, this confession of failings is curiously omitted. So I am puzzled. I strain at the seeming "misplacement" of things. But I am urged on by the discovery that every part of the Way of Life follows an orderly progression. I am also urged on by the discovery that the abstention from food sacrificed to idols was not included in the Way of Life because it would have been chronologically out of place there. Could it be then that there is a reason why the confession of failings does not show up prior to the eucharistic prayers?

My surmise, due to my origination hypothesis, is that this omission of the confession of failings is deliberate and signals what everyone knew--namely that the order of events within the Didache follows the order whereby a candidate comes to experience these events. Thus, if my surmise is correct, the eucharist in the Didache must represent the "the first eucharist" and the omission of the confession of failings hints at the fact that this public confession was suppressed whenever new candidates were baptized just prior to the eucharist. Many practical and pastoral reasons could be put forward to sustain suppressing a public confession of failings at "the first eucharist." Foremost among them would be the fittingness of joyfully welcoming the new "brothers" and "sisters" who had just been baptized without confronting them with a recital of the failings of permanent members. . . .<sup>41</sup>

For the moment, the question is not whether my origination hypothesis is correct or whether I have supplied probable reasons for suppressing the confession of failings at "the first eucharist." What is important is to notice how my origination hypothesis forces one to probe the text more deeply in order to find out just how far the evidence supplied by the text can be understood to support the explanatory matrix being tested. The origination hypothesis of Schöllgen expects an unorganized movement from topic to topic. Even Niederwimmer only expects the grouping of topics. Audet, for his part, sees the confession of failings as operative prior to every eucharist, but the absence of blank space on the page prevents him from giving it its rightful place. None of these three expects to find, therefore, a hidden logic that guides the narrator from topic to topic from beginning to end.

Not All Origination Hypotheses Are Created Equal

Not all theories, therefore, are created equal. Some force us to notice more about the text. More importantly, superior theories have a predictive capacity--they are "fraught with further intimations of an indeterminate range" that reveal themselves, from time to time, in "as yet undisclosed, perhaps as yet unthinkable, consequences."<sup>42</sup> Such theories also provide a greater intellectual satisfaction--they say more about what is the hidden depth of meaning within the text. As part of their greater fruitfulness and greater intellectual satisfaction, however, they also have a concomitantly greater vulnerability to being falsified.

An individual faced with the superior intellectual satisfaction of a new theory takes responsibility for sharing it with those working on similar problems and having similar training. That is what this conference is all about. It would be ludicrous, however, for me to expect that all of you, upon first hearing, would immediately abandon your favored theories and unanimously cling to my paradigm. Rather, I can only expect to gain some adherence while, at the same time, gaining critics as well.

Capable and insightful critics can be a blessing. They press forward the weaknesses of an origination hypothesis and force adherents to wrestle with anomalies that may not have been evident earlier. Critics worth their salt do not stop at articulating the soft spots or anomalies within an existing theory; rather, they go on to espouse an alternative that, for them, has a superior intellectual satisfaction and fruitfulness. In the end, therefore, a community engaged in authentic dialogue and facing shared problems of interpretation has much to gain by the exchange between passionately committed intellectual adversaries.

Conclusion

The brief time available does not allow me to press my origination hypothesis any further. Stepping back, however, I will be content if I leave you with enough specific instances of how I came to discover that the Didache was a unified production that conceals within its oral logic a hidden key that marvelously accounts for the progression of topics from beginning to end. With what I have provided, you can go on to make further discoveries by yourself. Being scholars, we always like to have the thrill of making discoveries for ourselves rather than simply being told. Then, when my thousand-page volume comes out in May of this year, you will have the delight of seeing just how far you were able to anticipate, and, in many instances, even to outdo my own.<sup>43</sup> I hope you will then send me an email or post your hunches on www.Didache.info so that we can become international learning partners.

In closing, I would say that the Didache has a special relevance within our modern society.<sup>44</sup> Any community that cannot artfully and effectively pass on its cherished way of life as a program for divine wisdom and graced existence cannot long endure. Any way of life that cannot be clearly specified, exhibited, and differentiated from the alternative modes operative within the surrounding culture is doomed to growing insignificance and to gradual assimilation. Faced with these harsh realities, the Didache unfolds the training program calculated to irreversibly alter the habits of perception and standards of judgment of novices coming out of a pagan life style.<sup>45</sup> The content and the modality of this process of human transformation can be gleaned from the verbal clues conveyed within the text itself. Once this is established, then it becomes possible to combine linguistic, historical, and sociological tools to recover the faith, hope, and life of those communities that existentially committed themselves to living the Way of Life. This is the way of scholarship. This is the way of life.

+++++

Post Script: Brief Considerations Respecting the Dating of the Didache

The date and provenance of the Didache has been entirely dominated by the question of what sources were used in its composition. Adolph von Harnack, in his 1884 commentary, wrote, "One must say without hesitation that it is the author of the Didache who used the Epistle of Barnabas and not the reverse."<sup>46</sup> Harnack, accordingly, dated the Didache between C.E. 135 and 165 and fixed the place of origin as Egypt since Barnabas was thought to have been composed there. It wasn't until 1945 that E.J. Goodspeed<sup>47</sup>, aided by the Latin versions of Barnabas that had no Two-Way section, finally put to rest the dependence upon Barnabas.

Once the Epistle of Barnabas was no longer considered as the source for the writer of the Didache, a fresh impetus was given to the question of which, if any, of the known Gospels were used by the framers of the Didache. It is telling that, in 1958, Audet devoted forty-two pages to the Barnabas-dependence issue and only twenty pages to the Gospel-dependence issue.<sup>48</sup> When examined closely, Audet concluded that even the so-called "evangelical addition" of Did. 1:3b-5 cannot be explained as coming either from Matthew or from Luke.<sup>49</sup> Audet's enduring accomplishment was to demonstrate that the Didache can be best understood when it is interpreted within a Jewish horizon of understanding more or less independent of what one finds in the Gospels. Accordingly, in the end, Audet was persuaded that the manifest Jewish character of the Didache pointed to a completion date prior to C.E. 70 in a milieu (Antioch) that did not yet have a written Gospel.<sup>50</sup>

My article, "Synoptic Tradition in the Didache Revisited," will be published in the fall volume of the Journal of Early Christian Studies, and it is currently available at www.Didache.info. In part, my study concludes as follows:

When parallel texts are listed or even compared side by side, a plausible case can always be made for dependence upon Matthew's Gospel. More recently, however, more rigorous criteria have been developed in order to establish dependence. Jefford and Tuckett, for example, make the point that verbal agreement, in and of itself, cannot establish literary dependence since, in every case, one has to consider the possibility that the agreement present is due to both the Didache and Matthew having access to a common Jesus tradition. Thus, to establish dependence, one has to explore, even in cases of close or exact verbal agreement, to what degree the contexts and meanings overlap. Furthermore, one has to explore to what degree shared issues (fasting, praying, almsgiving, correcting, shunning) are defined and resolved along parallel lines. When these investigations were undertaken, however, they progressively revealed areas of wholesale divergence between Matthew and the Didache. In the end, consequently, this present study concludes that Matthew's Gospel and the Didache reveal two religious systems that grew up independent of each other. While they occasionally made use of common sources in defining their way of life, each community shaped these sources in accordance with their own distinctive ends. Hence, in the end, even their common heritage directs attention to their diversity.

Should Didache scholars come to accept this position, the way would be open for an early dating of the Didache and for its interpretation as a well-integrated and self-contained religious system that must be allowed to speak for itself. Matthew's Gospel can no longer be called upon to amplify or to distort the unique voice of the Didache. A new era of Didache studies would thus lie open before us.

1. Aaron Milavec, "Synoptic Tradition in the Didache Revisited," Journal of Early Christian Studies 10/3 (Fall 2003) pages yet to be assigned.

2. Within the Didache, the vocabulary and the linguistic structure itself displays a one-sided preference for orality. Thus, the Didache defines the Way of Life and immediately goes on to specify the "training" required for the assimilation "of these words" (1:3). The novice is told to honor "the one speaking to you the word of God" (4:1) thereby signaling that oral training was presupposed. Moreover, the novice trembles "at the words that you have heard" (3:8).

In every instance where the Didache cites specific mandates from the Hebrew Scriptures, the oral aspect (as opposed to the written) is highlighted: "It has been said" (1:6); "The Lord has likewise said" (9:5); "This is the thing having been said by the Lord" (14:3); "As it has been said" (16:7). The same thing can be presumed to hold true when citing the "good news" (8:2, 11:3, 15:3, 15:4; see #11e). Accordingly, the Didache gives full attention to speaking rightly (1:3b, 2:3, 2:5, 4:8b, 4:14, 15:3b) and entirely neglects false or empty writing. At the baptism, the novice is immersed in water "having said all these things beforehand" (7:1). Thus, when the novice is warned to watch out for those who "might make you wander from this way of training" (6:1), one surmises that defective words rather than defective texts are implied. The same holds true, when later in the Didache, the baptized are warned only to receive him/her who "should train you in all the things said beforehand" (11:1) indicating that even the Didache was being heard. Finally, faced with the end time, each one is alerted to the importance of frequently being "gathered together" (16:2). This enforces an earlier admonition to "seek every day the presence of the saint in order that you may rest upon their words" (4:2)--thereby signaling once again how verbal exchange was paramount when "seeking the things pertaining to your souls" (16:2). The one misbehaving, accordingly, was reproofed "not in anger [i.e., angry words], but in peace" (15:3). Those unable to abide by the reproof received were cut off from hearing or being discussed by community members: "Let no one speak to him/her, nor let anyone hear from you about him/her until he/she should repent" (15:3).

From beginning to end, therefore, the vocabulary and linguistic structure of the Didache reinforce oral performance. The literary world of seeing, reading, writing, and editing are entirely passed over in silence. Accordingly, the Didache was created, transmitted, interpreted, and transformed in "a culture of high residual orality which nevertheless communicated significantly by means of literary creations" (Paul J. Achtemeier, "Omne verbum sonat: The New Testament and the Oral Environment of Late Western Antiquity," JBL 109/1 [1990] 9-19, 26-27). See Jonathan Draper, "Confessional Western Text-Centered Biblical Interpretation and an Oral or Residual-Oral Context," Semeia 73 (1996) 61-80 & Ian H. Henderson, "Didache and Orality in Synoptic Comparison," JBL 111 (1992) 295-299 & Milavec, The Didache, 715-725.

3. Achtemeier, "Omne verbum sonat," 3.

4. Achtemeier, "Omne verbum sonat," 9-11 and Walter Ong, The Presence of the Word (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1967) 52-53.

5. Achtemeier, "Omne verbum sonat," 27 and Ong, The Presence of the Word, 231-234.

6. For those hesitant to create their own oral recording, EasyGreek Software has reproduced, at a nominal cost, my oral presentation (20 min.) and, on the reverse side, has recorded a feminist adaptation by Deborah Rose-Milavec. Portions of this cassette might even find a suitable use in the classroom. See www.Didache.info for details.

7. Aaron Milavec, The Didache: Faith, Hope, and Life of the Earliest Christian Communities (New York: Paulist Press, 2003).

8. Michael Polanyi notes that all deep knowing implies a way of being in one's body and a way of being in the world that cannot be transmitted by a mere telling in words. Nor can such knowledge be entirely analyzed, dissected, and made plain such that a detached observer could discern the foundational principles involved and, through progressive steps in clear logic, arrive at the same affirmations as the teller. Polanyi repudiates the ideal of critical, detached knowing as unrealized and unrealizable (both in science as well as in religion), and Polanyi explains that this is so by virtue of the fact that all knowledge is embodied knowledge relying upon tacit skills:

If we know a great deal that we cannot tell, and if even that which we know and can tell is accepted by us as true only in view of its bearing on a reality beyond it . . . ; if indeed we recognize a great discovery, or else a great personality, as most real, owing to the wide range of its yet unknown future manifestations: then the idea of knowledge based on wholly identifiable grounds collapse, and we must conclude that the transmission of knowledge from one generation to the other must be predominantly tacit (Polanyi, Tacit Dimension [Garden City: Doubleday, 1966] 61).

In the end, for an adult to learn the ways of a master, he/she has to submit to a prolonged apprenticeship. Polanyi notes that, even in an apprenticeship, learning depends upon a certain sympathy that exists between the novice and master. This sympathy begins in the spontaneous admiration that prompts the novice to establish a master-apprentice relationship in the first place. This sympathy operates throughout the apprenticeship itself, giving the novice the means to enter into and to assimilate the performance skills exhibited by his/her trusted master:

The pupil must presume that a teaching which appears meaningless to start with has in fact a meaning which can be discovered by hitting on the same kind of indwelling as the teacher is practicing. Such an effort is based upon accepting the teacher's authority (1966:61).

Authority within the context of an apprenticeship is not to be confused with authoritarianism. The master of a craft does not intend to accept the compliance and admiration of disciples in order to rule over them but rather to transform them into skilled performers. The authority of a master, consequently, is directed toward progressively enlarging the performance skills of novices such that they, in the end, demonstrate that they understand his/her words because they share the way of being and doing that is upheld and prized by the community to which they belong.

Applying this to the Didache, it becomes clear that novices were not intent upon entering an authoritarian system where they were simply told what to do and what not to do. Rather, novices came forward intent upon achieving for themselves the way of being and of doing (the wisdom) exemplified by those mentors whom they admired. This demanded an interior transformation that could only be achieved due to trusting person-to-person contacts over an extended period of time in what Polanyi would describe as an apprenticeship.

9. Polanyi repudiates the ideal of critical, detached knowing as unrealized and unrealizable (both in science as well as in religion), and Polanyi explains that this is so by virtue of the fact that all knowledge is embodied knowledge relying upon tacit skills:

If we know a great deal that we cannot tell, and if even that which we know and can tell is accepted by us as true only in view of its bearing on a reality beyond it . . . ; if indeed we recognize a great discovery, or else a great personality, as most real, owing to the wide range of its yet unknown future manifestations: then the idea of knowledge based on wholly identifiable grounds collapse, and we must conclude that the transmission of knowledge from one generation to the other must be predominantly tacit (Polanyi, The Tacit Dimension, 61). Given the tacit character of all deep knowing, Polanyi insists that no scientific, artistic, or religious enterprise can be entirely analyzed, dissected, and expressed in plain language such that a detached observer could discern and affirm the foundational principles involved and, through progressive steps in clear logic, arrive at the same tacit skills presupposed by the master.

10. Polanyi notes that the success of any given master-apprentice relationship either succeeds or falters on the basis of the quality of the sustained admiration and sympathy operative within the apprenticeship itself:

The pupil must presume that a teaching which appears meaningless to start with has in fact a meaning which can be discovered by hitting on the same kind of indwelling as the teacher is practicing. Such an effort is based upon accepting the teacher's authority (Polanyi, The Tacit Dimension, 61).

Authority within the context of an apprenticeship is not to be confused with authoritarianism. The master of a craft does not intend to accept the compliance and admiration of disciples in order to rule over them but rather to transform them into skilled performers. The authority of a master, consequently, is directed toward progressively enlarging the performance skills of novices such that they, in the end, demonstrate that they understand his/her words because they share the way of being and doing that is upheld and prized by the community to which they belong.

Applying this to the Didache, it becomes clear that novices were not intent upon entering an authoritarian system where they were simply told what to do and what not to do. Rather, novices came forward intent upon achieving for themselves the way of being and of doing (the wisdom) exemplified by those mentors whom they admired. This demanded an interior transformation that could only be achieved due to trusting person-to-person contacts over an extended period of time in what Polanyi would describe as an apprenticeship.

11. Michael Polanyi, Personal Knowledge (Chicago: University Press, 1958). Polanyi insisted that the ideal of objective knowing based upon facts and experimentation alone was a misleading ideal that could never be put into practice. As suggested earlier, the personal calling of a scientist followed by long years of apprenticeship under admired masters reveals the personal dynamics that make all deep and transformative learning possible. Even later, those collaborating within a research program continue to be guided by the tacit skills and overarching ideals learned from their mentors: "The riches of mental companionship between two equals can be released only if they share a convivial passion for others greater than themselves, within a like-minded community--the partners must belong to each other by participating in a reverence for a common superior knowledge" (378). All this applies, with even a greater force, to the bonds within the Didache communities.

12. Autobiography of Malcolm X (New York: Ballentine Books, 1965) 170.

13. Elijah Mohammed represented a way of life that powerfully attracted Malcolm. Through letters, and later, through personal contacts, Malcolm gradually discovered his own calling "to remove the blinders from the eyes of the black man [woman] in the wilderness of North America" (210). This calling emerged for Malcolm within the spontaneous awe and fear that he felt for his teacher. For more details, see Milavec, The Didache, box #1h.

14. In Milavec, The Didache, one finds over three hundred extended discussions bearing upon particular aspects of the social, historical, and religious world in which the Didache communities took shape. These discussions provide information and sources that are placed in boxes (defined by shaded areas) that are scattered throughout the book. For purposes of brevity, these sources will be henceforth presented in the text in abbreviated form. Thus, #1g refers to box g in chapter 1 of Milavec. #2b refers to box b in chapter 2.

15. In the revised decalogue of the Didache, the injunctions against practicing magic, making potions, and murdering offspring by means of abortion (2:2) apply principally to women. So, too, references to training "sons and daughters . . . in the fear of God" (4:9) also addresses a sphere largely relegated to women. When it comes to offering first fruits of the dough being made into bread (13:5), one has here a sphere of activity entire dominated by women. Did. 13:6f might apply equally to men and women.

16. In the revised decalogue of the Didache, the injunctions against adultery, corrupting boys, and illicit sex (2:2) apply principally to men. In the ancient world, a husband could commit adultery only by having intercourse with the wife of another man; if he had sexual relations with a slave, a prostitute, a concubine, or a divorced or widowed woman, this did not constitute adultery. Outside of pederasty which Jews particularly abhorred (Josephus, Ag. Ap. 1.199; Philo, Special Laws 3.37, Contemplative Life 52, 57-61), one cannot know to what degree the prohibition of "illicit sex" (porneia) excluded men from having sexual relations with slaves, prostitutes, and concubines. When it comes to offering first fruits of the wine vat and the threshing floor (13:5), one has here a sphere of activity entire dominated by men. Did. 13:6f might apply equally to men and women.

17. Milavec, The Didache, 12-46. The Greek of the Didache is very much gender-inclusive. This quality, however, is practically entirely lost in English, French, and German translations that are forced, by rules of grammar, to give preference to the male gender. To my knowledge, Milavec is the first person to provide a gender-inclusive translation.

18. The only function specifically reserved for men was the one in which negotiations with outsiders (nearly always men) was mandatory (15:1). Niederwimmer interprets Did. 15:1f to mean "that the local officials, together with the prophets and teachers (or, to the extent that the last two groups are absent, they alone) lead the worship service that formerly was in the hands of the prophets and teachers alone" (1998:202; also held by Catholic scholars, such as Schillebeeckx 1981:23). Rordorf, for his part, reads Did. 15:1f in a more radical manner: "the bishops and deacons are charged to replace them" (1998:228; also held by Catholic scholars, such as R. Brown 1980:336) as presiders at the eucharist. Schöllgen, in contrast, takes the position that "these matters remain in the dark" (1996:59). Going beyond Schöllgen, I would argue that the Didache provides sufficient evidence to decide that neither the prophets nor the bishops presided at the eucharist (see #6o and #9f). From my reading of the evidence, the presider at the first eucharist would have been the presider at the baptism, namely, the mentor who had "fathered" or "mothered" the candidate. Space prohibits me from developing this topic here. One can be sure, however, that if women were being trained by women, then the logic of the text and of the culture would lead us to surmise that these same women were baptizing and eucharistizing.

19. Deborah Rose Gaier, "The Didache: A Community of Equals," a paper presented in the "Women and the Historical Jesus" session of the Society of Biblical Literature's 1996 Annual Meeting. Highlights summarized in John Dominic Crossan, The Birth of Christianity: Discovering What Happened in the Years Immediately After the Execution of Jesus (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1998) 369-373. Citation from p. 371.

20. In the Synoptic Gospels, one finds what John Dominic Crossan refers to as a "an almost savage attack on family values" (Jesus: A Revolutionary Biography [San Francisco: Harper, 1994] 58). Sayings such as "I have come to set a man against his father . . ." (Mt 10:35f) and "Call no one your father on earth" (Mt 23:9) serve to illustrate how inter-generational strife (1994:60) arose as parents endeavored to use their authority to block the conversion of their adult children.

21. See Aaron Milavec, "The Social Setting of 'Turning the Other Cheek' and 'Loving One's Enemies' in Light of the Didache," BTB 25/2 (1995) 131-143.

22. The Didache is the oldest known Christian document that makes it clear that, in the act of giving, what is given has been freely received from the Father. This evaluation of personal possessions finds clear expression in other Christian and Jewish documents as well (see #2d).

23. The Derek Eres Zuta, a third-century training manual for rabbinic students, echoes this same theology:

If you did a great favor [for someone], regard it as small, and do not say, "I did this good act with my own [money]."
Rather it was [from what God] had graciously given you, and you should offer thanks to Heaven (2:10).

24. G.E.M. de Sainte Croix, The Class Struggle in the Ancient Greek World from the Archaic Age to the Arab Conquests (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1981) 194-197 & Gildas Hamel, Poverty and Charity in Roman Palestine, First Three Centuries CE (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990) 219 & J.S. Reid, "Charity, Almsgiving (Roman)," Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics. Ed. by James Hastings (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1922) Vol. 3, pp. 391f).

25. Milavec, The Didache, 190-198. The eight effects of implementing the rule of 1:5 are as follows:

1. Preparing for a Lifetime of Sharing Everything with One's Brothers
2. Breaking Addiction to Increased Economic Productivity
3. Developing the Habit of Acting in Imitation of God
4. Relieving the Debt of Gratitude for the Knowledge and Life Received
5. Tasting the Benefit of Almsgiving as Ransoming One's Sins
6. Beginning a Prophetic Witness to God's Future Designs
7. Preparing to Publicly Account for One's New Commitments
8. Breaking Down the Bond between the Candidate and His Biological Family

26. David Flusser, "Paul's Jewish-Christian Opponents in the Didache," Gigul. Ed. by S. Shaked et al. (Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1987) 86. Reprinted in The Didache in Modern Research. Ed. by Jonathan A. Draper (Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1996) 195-211.

27. Clayton N. Jefford, in his The Sayings of Jesus in the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles (Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1989), proposed that the Didachist "did not seek to replace the 'yoke of the Torah' with the 'yoke of Jesus' (cf. Did. 6:2) but instead . . . was anxious to weld the two yokes into a single system" (102). The details of Jefford's thesis were largely undeveloped; yet, in effect, Jefford offered a variant of Flusser's thesis (without mentioning him).

28. Jonathan Draper, "Torah and Troublesome Apostles in the Didache Community," Novum Testamentum 33/4 (1991) 368.

Essays on Its Text, History and Transmission. Ed. by Clayton N. Jefford (Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1995) 231-232.

30. Huub van de Sandt and David Flusser, The Didache: Its Jewish Sources and its Place in Early Judaism and Christianity (Minneapolis: Fortress; Assen: Royal Van Gorcum, 2002).

31. In my forthcoming book, The Didache, I devote an entire chapter to examining this position. It will suffice here, in passing, to sketch my own position on this matter:

1. To begin with, it is extraneous to make appeals to Acts 15:20 or to the Noahide Covenant by way of resolving the background for interpreting D16:2-3. The framers of the Didache knew nothing of Acts 15:20. In fact, the very formulation of the way of life for gentiles clearly goes way beyond both Acts 15:20 and the requirements of the Noahide Covenant. Flusser, more especially, repeatedly downplays or ignores historical development within Jewish sources. David Novak, meanwhile, demonstrates that the very notion of the Noahide Covenant did not emerge within formative Judaism until the time of the Tosephta (The Image of the Non-Jew in Judaism: An Historical and Constructive Study of the Noahide Laws [Lewiston: The Edwin Mellen Press, 1983] 5-8). Discussion of the Noahide Covenant would thus be entirely out of place within Didache studies.

2. The same thing can be said relative to uses of Paul and of Matthew. Both Draper and Flusser identify those "apostles" coming with the intention of "tearing down" (Did. 11:2) the tradition of perfection set out in the Didache with Pauline Christians (Draper 1991:372; Flusser 1987:71-90, 1992:239, 268). It follows that the "lawlessness" (Did. 16:4 anomos) characterizing "false-prophets and corrupters" (Did. 16:3) just prior to the Lord's coming can be identified as the Pauline doctrine that the gentiles are saved through faith in Christ without observing Torah (1991:370)! Here, again, careful analysis demonstrates that the framers of the Didache took no notice of Paul; hence, it is hazardous to suppose that Paul or his theology is the bête noire which is being fended off by the Didache. The same holds for Matthew's Gospel.

3. Flusser, given his ahistorical predispositions, easily associates "yoke of the Lord" with the Mosaic Torah (2002:241). Draper, being more careful, notes that the phrase "yoke of the Lord" does not appear within the early rabbinic material. While "yoke of the Torah" is used, Draper cites its usage in a text that also uses "yoke of the [Roman] kingdom" and "yoke of worldly care" (m. Abot 3:5). This demonstrates that, as late as the early third century, "yoke" was a far-reaching metaphor that found applications to areas of existence quite apart from Torah (1991:364). Even if "yoke of the Lord" had some consistent use in both the Christian Scriptures and in the rabbinic sources, however, it would still have to be examined whether the internal rhetoric and logic of the Didache support that meaning.

32. Paula Fredrikson, "Judaism, the Circumcision of Gentiles, and Apocalyptic Hope: Another Look at Galatians 1 and 2," JTS 42 (1991) 547.

33. A novice would be expected to receive invitations from friends and extended family members to give thanks to the gods on the occasion of important moments in their lives: the birth, coming of age, or marriage of a child, success in business, returning safe from a long voyage, etc. Such meals were not, in and of themselves, pagan rites. Nor was there necessarily any notion that eating of the food constituted some sort of sacramental union with a god (Wendel Lee Willis, Idol Meat in Corinth: The Pauline Argument in 1 Corinthians 8 and 10 [Chico: Scholars Press, 1985] 21-62 w/r 1 Cor 10:20). The Didache, after all, regarded the gods as "dead" (6:3). Nonetheless, those who joined in the meal would be expected to tacitly acknowledge that the feast was being celebrated in thanksgiving for a particular blessing received from a particular god (Willis:39-42). Thus eating any meal offered to idols constituted a denial that "apart from [the true] God, nothing happens" (3:10). Hence, such food was off limits.

34. Jean-Paul Audet, La Didache: Instructions des apôtres (Paris: J. Gabalda, 1958) 460. Here and elsewhere, I have translated the French into English.

35. Kurt Niederwimmer, The Didache. Tr. by Linda M. Maloney of the 1989 German orig. (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998) 228.

36. Willy Rordorf, La doctrine des douze apôtres. Tr. of Greek and critical notes by A. Tuilier (Paris: Cerf, 1978) 49f & 1998 revision of the same work, pp. 226-228.

37. Niederwimmer, The Didache, 199.

38. Georg Schöllgen, "The Didache as a Church Order: An Examination of the Purpose for the Composition of the Didache and its Consequences for its Interpretation," The Didache in Modern Research. Ed. by Jonathan A. Draper (Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1996) 63. Tr. and reprint, "Die Didache als Kirchenordnung," Yahrbuch für Antike und Christentum 29 (1986) 5-26.

39. Schöllgen, "The Didache as a Church Order, 50.

40. Schöllgen, "The Didache as a Church Order, 59.

41. Milavec, The Didache, 237f.

42. Polanyi, The Tacit Dimension, 23.

43. My commentary, needless to say, does not just settle with establishing the unity of the Didache, it goes on to milk every line of the document in order to recover all we can know about the faith, hope, and life of those communities that existentially committed themselves to the Way of Life. Such a reconstruction has only been possible because the unity of the Didache has been established as pointing back to a unified group in space and time. As long as the Didache was merely a collage of materials, it would represent multiple points of view held by different groups separated by place and time.

44. In my forthcoming volume, I dedicate an entire chapter to the spiritual of the Didache and its relevance for addressing pressing problems within our contemporary society (Milavec, The Didache, 842-909).

45. Michael Polanyi notes that all deep knowing implies a way of being in one's body and a way of being in the world that cannot be transmitted by a mere telling in words. Nor can such knowledge be entirely analyzed, dissected, and made plain such that a detached observer could discern the foundational principles involved and, through progressive steps in clear logic, arrive at the same affirmations as the teller. Polanyi repudiates the ideal of critical, detached knowing as unrealized and unrealizable (both in science as well as in religion), and Polanyi explains that this is so by virtue of the fact that all knowledge is embodied knowledge relying upon tacit skills:

If we know a great deal that we cannot tell, and if even that which we know and can tell is accepted by us as true only in view of its bearing on a reality beyond it . . . ; if indeed we recognize a great discovery, or else a great personality, as most real, owing to the wide range of its yet unknown future manifestations: then the idea of knowledge based on wholly identifiable grounds collapse, and we must conclude that the transmission of knowledge from one generation to the other must be predominantly tacit (Polanyi, The Tacit Dimension, 61).

In the end, for an adult to learn the ways of a master, he/she has to submit to a prolonged apprenticeship. Polanyi notes that, even in an apprenticeship, learning depends upon a certain sympathy that exists between the novice and master. This sympathy begins in the spontaneous admiration that prompts the novice to establish a master-apprentice relationship in the first place. This sympathy operates throughout the apprenticeship itself, giving the novice the means to enter into and to assimilate the performance skills exhibited by his/her trusted master:

The pupil must presume that a teaching which appears meaningless to start with has in fact a meaning which can be discovered by hitting on the same kind of indwelling as the teacher is practicing. Such an effort is based upon accepting the teacher's authority (1966:61).

Authority within the context of an apprenticeship is not to be confused with authoritarianism. The master of a craft does not intend to accept the compliance and admiration of disciples in order to rule over them but rather to transform them into skilled performers. The authority of a master, consequently, is directed toward progressively enlarging the performance skills of novices such that they, in the end, demonstrate that they understand his/her words because they share the way of being and doing that is upheld and prized by the community to which they belong.

Applying this to the Didache, it becomes clear that novices were not intent upon entering an authoritarian system where they were simply told what to do and what not to do. Rather, novices came forward intent upon achieving for themselves the way of being and of doing (the wisdom) exemplified by those mentors whom they admired. This demanded an interior transformation that could only be achieved due to trusting person-to-person contacts over an extended period of time in what Polanyi would describe as an apprenticeship.

46. Adolph von Harnack, Die Lehre der zwölf Apostel nebst Untersuchungen zur alttestamentlichen Geschichte der Kirchenverfassung und des Kirchenrechts (Leipzig: Hinrichs, 1884) 82.

47. E. J. Goodspeed published a landmark article in which he was troubled by the Latin versions of Barnabas which had no Two-Way section. Goodspeed argued that "early Christian literature usually grew not by partition and reduction, but by combination and expansion," and, from this, it can be deduced that the oldest version of Barnabas must have been prepared without any Two-Way section ("The Didache, Barnabas and the Doctrina," ATR 27 [1945] 228).

48. Audet, La Didache, 121-163 w/r Barnabas independence & 166-186 w/r Gospel independence.

49. Audet, La Didache, 186.

50. Audet, La Didache, 192, 210.